

My name is Dennis Jensen, with Real Time Enterprises in Minnesota. I was surprised to learn that the FCC is looking at easing regulations for telcos. The current rules barely do enough to promote competition now and taking them away will only limit the market to a few very large players that don't care about the customer.

Rather than limit competition for ISPs, the FCC should take a hard look at cable companies. In Minnesota there is limited competition for cable providers which is bad enough for monthly cable TV prices, but even worse, there are NO options to work with Independent ISPs for Internet service. Competition is the key to satisfied consumers- it forces companies to provide the best service at the lowest cost.

Throw out any changes to the telco regulations and instead look at creating competition in the cable industry.

Thanks.
